

COLLEGE REPORT

By ROBERT M. BERSI
Assistant to the President
California State College, Dominguez Hills

Last summer a community conference on "Environmental Problems and Urban Design and Beautification" came into being because of the common interest and cooperative effort of two relatively new institutions: California State College, Dominguez Hills, and the Southwest Area Regional Planning Committee.

California State College, Dominguez Hills, the newest four-year college in the California State College system, serves a heterogeneous urban population of approximately 1.25 million located in the southwest section of Los Angeles County. The college admitted students in the fall of 1965 and graduated its first class one week before this conference began in June, 1967.

The college has a decided stake in the environmental quality of the area it serves and a clear interest in identifying and solving urban problems. The college has indicated to community leaders its desire to act as a repository for data pertaining to planning activities in the region and also as an interpreter of that data to the public, with the intent of stimulating action.

THIS ROLE is facilitated by the college's detachment from the daily demands, political pressures, and limited budgets of local governing boards. Its resources can function as a common bond and language between the separate jurisdictions, thus heightening the liaison between the institution and the entire region. Furthermore, urban area studies are scheduled to be a specific part of its future academic program.

Dominguez Hills anticipates an eventual enrollment of 20,000 students, most of them reared in high density environments. Many of these students will concern themselves with understanding urban affairs and resolving civic problems. To help meet this need, the college has included in its approved academic master plan a graduate institute of Environmental Design and Urban Studies, to be initiated within three to four years.

As a step toward further implementation of the college's function as an educational institution serving the community, the staff of California State College, Dominguez Hills, in the summer of 1966, suggested that the college host a conference on environmental quality and urban design and beautification, to be held on campus in the late spring or early summer of 1967.

IN THE meantime, interest in a similar conference was being expressed by the Southwest Area Planning Committee. That committee was organized in June, 1966, and has held monthly meetings regularly since that time. Serving on the committee are professional planners, local planning commissioners, city councilmen, and other interested citizens representing 14 communities.

The committee cooperates closely with the Los Angeles County Regional Planning Commission to produce plans and guidelines for developing the entire Southwest Los Angeles County area. The Southwest Area Planning Committee is motivated by the philosophy that planning and research is best accomplished
